What were once the centralized training grounds for the Iowa National Guard in early 1909, has aged nearly 103 years, becoming one of the premier National Guard training bases in the country.

However, in order to do the story of Camp Dodge justice, one needs to start with the years leading up to 1909. At the turn of the 20th century, Iowa National Guard units, while hosted and supported by individual community-based armories, shared a need for a common location to host their annual training camp.

Adjutant General Melvin Byers acted upon that need. Identifying both a desire for a centrally-located camp near the state capital, and the fact Des Moines was already home to a U.S. Army installation at Fort Des Moines, the Iowa National Guard and the State of Iowa moved forward with the purchase of 160 acres adjacent to Fort Des Moines in 1909. It was soon discovered this land was unserviceable due to ground instability and environmental issues. What was initially envisioned as an annual training facility was deemed not the best solution for the Iowa National Guard.

When the federal government purchased 320 acres of land northwest of Des Moines in 1906 for use as a shooting range, the Iowa National Guard promptly began proceedings to sell its land near Fort Des Moines and initiated negotiations to purchase land adjacent to the new federal firing range. The Iowa National Guard had trouble liquidating its land on the south side of Des Moines, while determining that purchasing land next to the federal range was uneconomical. They instead purchased land near the already-established Inter-Urban Railway system in 1909. Camp Dodge, named in honor of Iowa Civil War hero Maj. Gen. Grenville M. Dodge, was christened and opened for use by Adjutant General Guy Logan in 1910.

While the site was used sparingly in the days leading up to the U.S. entrance into World War I, Des Moines’ bid to be one of 16 U.S. Army national training camps changed the history of Camp Dodge forever. Selected as the 13th National Cantonment, Camp Dodge featured 1,500 buildings, a 500-bed hospital, a power plant, and training ranges during World War I. As an induction site, it was the starting point for more than 118,000 Soldiers, 37,111 of which were from Iowa, and the demobilization point for 208,000 Midwest-based Soldiers.

The recipient of several aesthetic Works Progress Administration projects during the Great Depression, Camp Dodge again became an induction center and training base during World War II.

In the decades that followed World War II, Camp Dodge became home to many agencies, both military and civilian, as well as the headquarters for the Iowa National Guard. Borrowing upon Adjutant General Louis Lasher’s vision of Camp Dodge as a national training center in the early 1920s, it has evolved into America’s finest training facility, second to none.

With over 4,400 acres of training areas, ranges, and cantonment, Camp Dodge is entering its second century with a new name, the Camp Dodge Joint Maneuver Training Center. While buildings, people, and installation names may change, the heritage of Camp Dodge remind us of its humble origins and its continued impact on U.S. military history and training.

The mission of the Iowa ARNG environmental management program is to ensure all facilities and operations comply with Federal, State, local and Army environmental protection regulations. The program deals with regulatory compliance, as well as conservation issues, such as natural and cultural resource requirements.

Camp Dodge is home to more than 600 plant species, many protected by state law. Two state-endangered animal species, the plains pocket mouse and eastern spotted skunk, can also be found on post. The training area contains more than 700 acres of wetlands and streams.

Wetland restoration projects developed in partnership with area universities provide habitat protection and research opportunities, while also providing a realistic training environment. One wetland restoration area is also the site of a physical training track with exercise stations, available for all site users.

A number of historic resources are also located on post. Site maps outline their location and level of protection.

Personnel who manage the ranges and maintenance training facilities are knowledgeable in the regulatory compliance requirements of their respective facilities. They will direct users on the procedures to prevent safety issues and environmental damage.

While on post, users must comply with environmental protection requirements outlined in INGR 200-1. For additional information please contact the Training Site staff, or the Environmental Branch.

The Iowa Army National Guard has implemented an Environmental Management System that conforms with the requirements of the international ISO 14001 standard. Information about the program can be found in the Environmental Management System Binder, INGR 200-1 and ING Pam 200-1.
